Short Answer (Sample Responses)

Q1: Each country weighs its economic capacity, political climate, and public opinion differently, leading to varied refugee admission quotas and asylum regulations.

Q2: The case study describes overcrowded camps with makeshift tents, limited water supplies, and inadequate sanitation, so children there face malnutrition and the illnesses that spread wherever clean water and sanitation are short.

Q3: More coordinated funding, resettlement programs, and diplomatic efforts to resolve root conflicts can alleviate the pressure on host countries and support refugees adequately.
